Scales assessing patients' trust in their clinicians have been developed and studies undertaken to identify those aspects of clinician-patient encounters which inspire patient trust.\textsuperscript{1-3} Findings indicate that physicians who demonstrate competency and caring are more likely to inspire their patients to trust them.

Demonstrations of competency, as seen by patients, include: thoroughness in evaluation of problems and provision of treatment that is both warranted and effective. Interpersonal skills that demonstrate caring and inspire trust include those that make patients feel that clinicians: are listening to them, and can understand their perspectives; are caring, honest and respectful; are communicating fully and clearly; and are willing to build partnerships and share in decisionmaking.\textsuperscript{□}

\begin{enumerate}

\end{enumerate}

Judith A. Greenfield is contributing editor of the \textit{Healthcare Communication Review} and President of the Healthcare Communication Project, Inc.

Click here for your free subscription to the \textit{Healthcare Communication Review}. (Note that in order to receive the Professional Supplement to the \textit{Review} you must indicate that you are a healthcare professional.)